

What Can A Well Written Resume Do For Your Job Search?

When you write your resume you will need to keep in mind exactly what it is you are trying to do with your resume. If you totally understand what you are trying to accomplish, your chances of getting the job you want increase greatly. A well-written resume accomplishes many discrete things. They are stand alone functions, but in a given situation each can play a huge function in your career search. The most difficult and most basic function of a resume is to send ahead and set up a meeting. Getting your foot in the door is the most challenging function because you will have direct competitors in the struggle for interviews. It is the most elementary function because if you don't get that meeting, there can be no next step. Perhaps the ignored function of a resume, but critically significant, is guiding the order of business during the meeting. Have you noticed that most interviewers form their questions directly from your resume? Typically, employers go right through your career background inquiring about each situation. Make your resume easy to follow, while creating interest. Another function of your resume is a leave-behind and a reminder following the interview. Many employment hunters do not think about this critical function of the resume. The resume retells your story to the employer of all you can do for them, but that's not everything. The character of a written presentation can sway an employer. Bringing in someone new is a critical decision. To justify or persuade others within a company, they will use your resume. Companies do not want to make mistakes and there may be people behind decisions about the candidate who never met the candidate. Your resume could get passed around to people with the power to stand behind the hiring decision or put a stop to your hiring contingent on what they see. The interviewer might think you are right for the job and want to bring you on board. But they might still need to sell you to their boss. A great resume is the best sales tool they could have in their possession. <http://savvyresume.com>
