As in group counseling, the therapist also acts as moderator in family counseling. He or she attempts to ensure that each family member gets fair time for expressing concerns and contributing to the conversation as to how the family can do better. Sometimes the therapist may identify one or more family members who need more than the family counseling model, and might benefit from individual therapy. The personal issues of one member of a family may affect all other family members. For families, family counseling often helps because it involves a disinterested third party who does not favor any one member of the family.

The firm introduces in Florida Family Counseling with the idea to make each parent acknowledge that their intentions are the same for their children to grow up and to become successful adults happily. This is the workable solution for each family. The number one characteristic of a happy family is a loving relationship between parents. This characteristic is made clear by William Penzer Ph.D. & Associates. This serves as the foundation for a happy family. Different theoretical models exist in family counseling in Florida. Whatever the approach, the main goal continues to be to improve the relationship of each family member to the others, so that the family progresses as a harmonious unit.
